These effects of climate change would have severe adverse impacts on human kind and nature, with the poor countries being the most vulnerable ones. But the world still has the choice : Do we want to collectively go down that route of unsustainable development ? Or shouldn't we rather develop our societies without giving such a burden to future generations ?

We have to combat climate change and achieve sustainable development at the same time. A sustainable society satisfies its needs without diminishing the prospects of the next generation. Contemporary society fails to meet this criterion. As a result questions of ecological sustainability arise in every continent. The planners should understand that the vast treasure of plant and animal life plays a vital role in maintaining the ecological balance for human kind to survive.

On the other hand, the world as a whole has experienced remarkable economic progress, at the cost of degradation of all the natural resources. So, both the developed and the developing countries should share common but differentiated responsibilities. The developed countries have to rapidly re-direct their societies and economies towards clean energy, energy efficiency and more sustainable consumption patterns. The countries in the developing world must get their chance to take a direct road towards a sustainable future, avoiding the deviation or relying on unsustainable energy forms such as fossil fuels.
